1. The Purpose of Academic Writing

The primary purpose of academic writing consists in understanding and applying the diverse theories and research methods of Cultural Studies. It also allows you to expand your analytical, research and presentation skills.

Your academic writing should reflect your awareness not only of the discipline of Cultural Studies, but also of your readership. Therefore, address a specific question/topic, carry out extensive research, and develop an original argument from evidence. In order to convince your readers, make sure that your paper is well-structured and conforms to the formal requirements illustrated below. Moreover, adopt an appropriate writing style, apply the technical vocabulary and adhere to all the principles for citing secondary sources.

The following guidelines give a general overview of the most significant principles for written assignments in the field of British Cultural Studies, but they are not exhaustive and we recommend students to consult their instructors before submitting their texts.

2. Topic Restriction and Research

FOCUS

Bear in mind that academic texts do not merely accumulate information, but combine facts, ideas and observations into an overall argument. Before you start collecting secondary sources or creating an outline for your paper, you should formulate a precise question that you are able to answer satisfactorily within the given time and with the resources available to you. Our website offers a selection of important topics from Cultural Studies which you can use as a starting point for your own research.

STRATEGIC RESEARCH

The quality of your academic writing considerably depends on your selection of relevant primary and secondary sources. While the former may include a wide range of cultural texts (written, visual or audio-visual) and constitute the main object of your analysis, the latter refers to all existing academic accounts examining this topic (cf. Stokes 32). Avoid using secondary sources whose form and content does not meet the general requirements of academic research. Therefore,

- select your sources carefully,
• be a purposeful reader,
• take notes, and
• keep full records of the sources from which you gathered information, e.g. by using reference management software such as Citavi.¹

Your secondary sources should include:
• monographs
• articles from anthologies
• articles from academic journals
• online resources.

For a bachelor’s thesis or a ‘wissenschaftliche Arbeit’ (Grundschule), you have to use at least 15 secondary sources, whereas you will need 30 secondary sources for a master’s thesis or ‘wissenschaftliche Arbeit’ (Mittelschule/Gymnasium). When writing a research project for a seminar, ask your instructor how many secondary sources they expect you to use.

CHECKLIST FOR YOUR PROJECT DESIGN (Stokes 36)

1. Does your research question make sense?
2. Is the project feasible? (Can you do it in the time available?)
3. Do you have access to your primary material?
4. Can you locate sufficient appropriate secondary sources?
5. Have you discussed your idea with your supervisor?
6. Is your question original?
7. Does your question build on previous research?

3. Planning and Structuring Your Writing

After having collected appropriate materials for your assignment, you should organise your ideas and match the information you collected to headings and subheadings that will form the outline of your final text.

Like every effective presentation, an academic text consists of a clear beginning (introduction), middle (main body) and end (conclusion). Each of these has a specific function for the overall text:

• The introduction explains and contextualises your research interest and, furthermore, presents the methodology you are going to apply and finishes with your thesis statement (i.e. your paper’s main idea/claim summarised in one or two sentences) and an outline of the main body. As you design your introduction, consider the following questions: What is the topic? Why is it relevant for Cultural Studies? How will this topic be examined? What primary sources will be used? How will the main body be structured?

- The main body develops your argument with the help of evidence and reasoning. It should start with a brief historical/theoretical contextualisation of your topic, i.e. a summary of existing research with regard to your own research question. Its most important element is the detailed analysis of your primary sources (cf. Stokes 34).
- In your conclusion, you summarise and weigh up the evidence provided in the main body, come to a concluding statement, and – if possible – point out related discussion questions or further studies.

Your paper should furthermore include: i) a title page, ii) a table of contents, iii) a list of illustrations (if necessary), iv) a complete list of works cited and v) a signed plagiarism disclaimer.

4. Quotations and References

Quotations and reference fulfil three important functions in academic texts: they help “[t]o avoid the charge of plagiarism, [...] give more authority to your writing, [...]” and they ensure that “[t]he reader can find the original source by using the reference section” (Bailey 73).

If you fail to acknowledge that you integrated another person’s ideas into your text, we have to reject your work and you will not pass the assessment. Therefore, it is vital to keep a full record of all your sources, distinguish between primary and secondary sources and conform to the citation rules of the Modern Language Association (MLA Handbook, 8th edition).

The two following style sheets have been created by Peter Tosic for the module “Anglistische Schlüsselqualifaktionen” and give a brief overview of the two basic citation conventions. A more extensive version of these style sheets is available as a brochure at Printy’s copy shop (Ritterstraße 5). Before you submit your paper, ask your instructor/supervisor which convention they prefer.

6. Submission

ESSAYS/TERM PAPERS
Submit one copy of your printed text by placing it in the mailbox (“pigeon hole”) of your instructor in the Department of British Studies (opening hours: Monday – Friday, 7am – 9pm). Fasten the pages of your paper with a paperclip or a punched pocket. Refrain from submitting term papers in plastic folders. Please ask your individual instructors whether they would like to have digital copies as well. (See further instructions in the examination regulations.)

BA THESES and MA THESES
Hand in two printed and bound copies as well as two digital copies (CDs) at the examination office during their office hours.

Wissenschaftliche Arbeit (Teacher Trainees)
Submit one printed and bound copy as well as one digital copy (e.g. CD) of your thesis to the SBA during their office hours and two printed and bound copies as well as two digital copies (e.g. CDs) to your supervisors; See further instructions in the examination regulations for teacher training programmes.

We strongly recommend you to meet your instructors after your papers have been marked. Thus, you can get individual feedback on your work.
