5. PROGRAMME CONTENT:

The academic concept of the MA in British Studies follows the structure of the new European approach to philology, which relies on the three individual subject areas of linguistics, literature and cultural studies, as well as on interdisciplinary cooperation between these fields. Due to their complex interconnectedness, the three research foci form an overall picture which exceeds the simple sum of the individual areas.

The MA in British Studies is an advanced level, research-focused degree which builds upon the corresponding Bachelor's degree (or equivalent).

During the MA programme, students broaden their subject-specific and interdisciplinary knowledge and skills in the areas of English linguistics, literature and cultural studies. At the same time, they study the current state of research in British Studies as a whole. In this way, the MA degree lays the foundations for further independent research and advanced studies in the field of British Studies.

The study of English literature engages with the history of Anglophone literatures (excluding the United States) from their beginnings to the present day. This ranges from English texts from the Middle Ages like ‘Beowulf’ to more recent English-language literature from countries in the former British Empire. In addition to exploring the English literary canon in depth, the department has a number of other teaching and research foci, including examining intercultural issues in literature (stereotypes, ethnic/religious/social differences and identities, orientalism). For this, students might look at travel literature or consider how non-European cultures are depicted in British literature. The department explores a wide range of genres, including popular literature, fantasy and children’s literature. We also explore different media types (books, film, the internet). Many classes take an interdisciplinary approach, crossing the boundaries between literature, religion and science, for example. To this end, we work closely with British Cultural Studies within Leipzig’s English department.

British Cultural Studies takes a wide-ranging approach to British and Irish culture and society. The department examines the mechanisms of (everyday) culture and explores the extent to which cultural texts reflect the political, social and economic interests of certain societal actors or groups. British Cultural Studies investigates questions of identity and representation, as well as the production, distribution and reception of cultural products. Students examine diverse materials including film, social media, print media, music, advertising and fashion. British Cultural Studies integrates methods and theories from linguistics, British literature studies, sociology, history, political science and media studies. The discipline explores the connections between popular culture and power, as well as how the public/consumers respond to popular culture. At Leipzig, our teaching and research is specialised in the following areas: popular culture, the United Kingdom in a global context, and national identities on the British Isles.

English Linguistics provides students with the theoretical knowledge and analytic skills needed to describe and analyse the English language. Students are equipped to make well-founded statements based on theory and methodological know-how about various phenomena in the English language. They investigate linguistic issues on the basis of linguistic data analysis, and the department helps them to understand empirical results and the implications of these results in terms of the validity of certain linguistic models. The department’s research foci include usage-based cognitive-functional linguistics, discourse linguistics, psycholinguistics and phraseology. Research is also conducted on the history of the English language, the national, local, social, and stylistic dimensions of the English language varieties, and multilingual contexts. In particular, the analysis of language varieties as expressions of cultural and social identities demonstrates points of reference to literary and cultural studies.

6. PROGRAMME STRUCTURE:

In the course of the MA programme, students accumulate 120 credits of which 30 credits are awarded upon the successful completion of a Master’s thesis written during the third and fourth semester. Students earn 60 credits each year, which are awarded upon successful completion of the examinations (which can be oral, written or assignment-based).

The MA in British Studies relies on three core modules and six core option modules. Two of the core option modules can be replaced by modules from other subject areas or by internships. 10 credit points can also be replaced by a subject-related stay abroad. You are advised to consult with the MA programme advisor before embarking on an internship or before applying to study abroad.
